Forensics and the Mystery Writer IS IT SCIENCE OR FICTION?

Harking back to how detectives of generations and centuries past went about their quest for forensic evidence is a passion among historical mystery and true crime writers. But what if there's hardly a clue as to what really happened? Can writers tell how old-time investigators convinced judges and juries with the science of the day? Or how early detectives analyzed and foiled perpetrator psychopathology? Do authors infer? Extrapolate? Create? Master historical mystery storytellers comment on their research methods – as well as their history-based plot– and character-building craft.

Panel moderator, E.W. COUNT's NYPD novel, The Hundred Percent Squad, is based on the exploits of a real upper Westside precinct detective team. For her book, COP TALK - True Detective Stories from the NYPD, she interviewed almost a hundred detective investigators from both local and specialized squads, including top 1980s crime scene detectives. MWA-NY program chair for over a decade, she often has invited forensics experts to speak to local mystery writers at Chapter meetings.
